

ABSTRACT

The method involves selecting features of a pattern to be imaged, notionally dividing the source into a plurality of source elements, for each source element, calculating the process window for each selected feature and then the OPC rules that optimize the overlap of the calculated process windows. Finally, those source elements are selected for which the overlapping of the process windows and the OPC rules satisfy specified criteria. The selected source elements define the source intensity distribution.